

The Most Magical Place on Earth?

This past summer, my family and I, along with my grandparents, went to Disney World. While we were all there, we all enjoyed the many wonders that Walt Disney had to offer us. We stayed there for about a week before we all returned back home on a plane back to the place we know as Wisconsin. After a day of being back, my parents started to complain of feeling ill, and we all know during this time, those words were never a good thing. My parents got a Covid test and found out that they had both contracted Covid. My older sister then started complaining of a sore throat and was constantly coughing. She also got a test as well, and it was found that she had gotten Covid. Later that day, my mom called both my grandparents to tell them that three of them had gotten Covid and that they should get tested just to be safe. My grandparents were also not feeling well, so there was already an idea that they could be dealing with Covid, as the rest of my family was. My grandparents called my mom later that day to let her know that THEY BOTH HAD COVID AS WELL! I couldn't believe that all my family members were getting Covid just from this trip to Disney. My younger sister and I both tested multiple times, and every time we were negative, so through this whole entire ordeal, somehow both my sister and I never contracted Covid, which was pretty unbelievable, as we both spent so much time with our family members together on this trip. My dad and my grandpa both ended up getting really sick, but luckily both recovered from this ordeal, after quite a long time, though. The days following my family's positive tests, I had to wear a mask at work, just as a precaution, which was really weird for me, as I hadn't worn a mask in months, so having to wear one again felt weird to me. Through this whole ordeal, though, I learned something very valuable: no matter what happened afterwards, I know my family wouldn't have done anything different, and we definitely would go back to Disney again, even though there was a good chance that Disney caused my family to get sick with the Covid virus. So, is Disney called the most Magical place on Earth? Yes it for sure is. Was it really the most magical place on Earth for my family members after the trip? Well, that remains to be seen.
