Yesterday, my sister exposed me to Covid-19. Now, I have to quarantine until my results for my test come in. I was supposed to work this weekend, but now I can't. I believe my sister was being very selfish by coming to Thanksgiving, knowing she has the virus. Being a college student living 3 hrs away from home, I am very dependent on my job. With rent to pay, tuition to pay, & even groceries to get, money is very important to me. But being exposed to Covid has made it impossible for me to make money. I can't lie, I am very stressed out. Not only do I need money for rent & other necessities, but the Holidays are coming up. How am I going to get my family gifts, & let alone see my family for Christmas if I have Covid? As the end of the school semester comes, so do all of the final projects, essays, & exams. Wish me luck, I will definitely be needing it.

After waiting a week for my Covid test results, I finally got them back. I tested negative. Thankfully, I would not be able to continue not working for another 2 weeks. Quarantine wasn't absolutely horrible, just very boring. I am very grateful my boyfriend put his health on the line to stay with me & comfort me during my quarantine. But now that quarantine is over, I have another event to stress about: finals week. This semester has been a challenge, with switching to all online, & my grades are not where I want them to be. My academic career is depending heavily on me doing good on all of my finals. But ~~to~~ imagine trying to balance being a full time student working in retail around Christmas after not working a whole weeks worth of shifts. So many things to do with absolutely no time to do everything. I just need to push through this last week, then I'm done for a while. I can do this.
